There is a widespread misconception that "estate planning" is of importance only to the wealthy. This course will help you recognize that there are a number of significant estate planning issues that deserve everyone's attention. An estate plan can be as simple as having a will and naming a beneficiary for your RRSPs, or as complicated as having several trusts for different purposes in addition to your will.

Although a person's "estate" is generally defined as his or her "property," there is no precise definition of "estate planning." Estate planning can be viewed as a series of steps to be taken, so that after a person dies, their property will be handled in a way that recognizes their values and wishes regarding their survivors and any charitable interests they might have. When folks start thinking about these things, some important lifetime concerns also come to mind, such as preparing for possible physical or mental disability. So those issues are also frequently addressed when developing an estate plan.

In addition, the topics in this course are applicable to the Advisor, Broker or Agent who is licensed in Life, A&S or General Insurance, so that they can run their financial businesses more effectively and plan for the future.
